Table of Contents

Acknowledgements vii

A Note on Language ix

1 Introduction 1
1.1 Objectives and Aims 1
1.2 Overview of the Relevant Literature: Opera—Culture—Gender 3
1.3 Masculinization and Feminization 8
1.4 Research Scope: Delimitations and Limitations 11
1.5 Structure 17

2 The Masculinization of the Stalinist Opera 19
2.1 Contextual Framework 19
2.2 Tikhon Khrennikov's Into the Storm (1939) 41
2.2.1 Virta's Novel Versus the Libretto 45
2.2.2 The Inadequate Soviet Man? 47
2.2.3 The Antagonists of the Soviet Operatic Canon 52
2.2.4 Natasha as the Ultimate Soviet Heroine? 57
2.3 Sergey Prokofiev's Semyon Kotko (1940) 64
2.3.1 The Unfulfilled Craving for a New Operatic Revolutionary 67
2.3.2 Semyon Kotko as a Melodrama 72
2.3.3 Sof'ya as the Melodramatic Ingénue 75
2.3.4 Female Revolutionary Fervor as Comic Relief 84
2.4 Sergey Prokofiev's The Story of a Real Man (1948) 88
2.4.1 The Remarkable Heroes of the 1940s 91
2.4.2 Aleksey as the Real Man 94

2.4.3 Soviet Femininity as a Healing Power 100
2.4.4 Romantic Relationships Lacking Romance 105
2.5 Dmitry Kabalevsky's The Taras Family (1950) 108
2.5.1 The Limitations of the Song Opera 113
2.5.2 Ode to the Brave Soviet Youth 117
2.5.3 Nastya—Reckless Revolutionary Teenager or a New Vision of Soviet Femininity? 122
2.5.4 The Depiction of Female Agency Within the Context of Stalinist Martial Masculinity 128
2.6 Summary 130

3 The Feminization of the Post-Stalin Opera 135
3.1 Contextual Framework 135
3.2 Tikhon Khrennikov's Mother (1957) 153
3.2.1 A Glance into the Periphery of a Soviet Hagiography 156
3.2.2 Pelageya as an Active Agent of the Revolution 159
3.2.3 Could There Be an Opera Without Romance? 166
3.2.4 The Absent Soviet Father 171
3.3 Rodion Shchedrin's Not Love Alone (1961) 175
3.3.1 Shchedrin's Kolkhoz at the Partition Between the New and the Old 179
3.3.2 Chastushka as a Driving Force of the Opera 183
3.3.3 Varvara Vasil'yevna Between Love and Duty 190
3.3.4 Not Love Alone as a Political Satire? 202
3.4 Sergey Slonimsky's Virineya (1967) 204
3.4.1 Virineya as the New Soviet Woman? 209
3.4.2 The Ending of the Society Known 215
3.4.3 Virineya as a Tragic Heroine 219
3.4.4 One Against Them All 225
3.5 Kirill Molchanov's The Dawns Here Are Quiet (1973) 229
3.5.1 The Precarious Portrayal of a Female World War II Soldier 232
3.5.2 Molchanov's Literary Interventions and Change of the Focal Point 237
3.5.3 Quotations as a Means of Supporting Remembrance 240
3.5.4 A New Perspective on a Soviet Fighter? 257
3.6 Summary 262

4 Conclusion 267

5 Bibliography 273