This book presents research that was executed within the framework of my Max Planck Research Group “Objects in the Contact Zone – The Cross-Cultural Lives of Things” at Kunsthistorisches Institut in Florenz – Max-Planck-Institut between 2011 and 2018. I therefore thank the Max-Planck-Society for providing the funds and structures for this undertaking.

I am very grateful to Gerhard Wolf and Alessandro Nova for the consistent support of this research group in Florence. The project would never have flourished as well as it did without the KHI’s outstanding academic environment, and our work has benefitted greatly from a lively exchange with numerous colleagues who have worked and visited there over the years. The idea for this volume grew out of conversations with Anna Sophia Messner, who was a doctoral fellow in my group, and with Kerstin Schankweiler, who stayed a close academic friend of the project after having spent a short term as a visiting researcher in Florence. Their steady commitment made it possible to continue working on this publication together, even after the sometimes much too fast-paced rhythm of academic commitments had led us to other places. Lea Mönninghoff helped as a student assistant in the first stages of preparation of the manuscript in Florence, Marie Hummel at TU Dresden assisted when we finalized it for submission. An important step along the way was a writing retreat that brought almost all contributors together for several days in the summer of 2017 in Hohenems. Hanno Loewy, the director of the Jewish Museum Hohenems, generously provided us with space to work—and by way of his museum’s splendid exhibition he introduced us to his take on objects and their historic agency, which we found very much in tune with ours.

Monica Juneja, Russell Ó Ríagáin, and two anonymous peer reviewers provided great encouragement along with valuable critical feedback. They made it possible to turn the manuscript into a splendid book at Heidelberg University Press, where it is most aptly placed within the Heidelberg Studies on Transculturality series. The open access version of this volume was generously supported with a grant from the University Library of Freie Universität Berlin, I thank Robert Ave and the team edocs as well as Kerstin Schankweiler and Tobias Wendl who facilitated this.

Last but not least, most heartfelt thanks go out to the authors of this book. They have all been collaborators or fellows of my Max Planck Research Group. Each of them embraced the spirit of “Objects in the Contact Zone” from a different angle. Yet, the keen interest in enhancing and developing our perspectives provided ample common ground and
